Attributed to the Maricopa Tribe of Southwestern Arizona.

DESCRIPTION

The pottery is a water jug with a rounded shape; the round center tapers down to a flat bottom which has kept its original rust/red color and burnish and shows chips in various places. The round center tapers up to a wide neck with a flared rim. The lower bottom of the jug is undecorated and there is a lug-type handle on each side of the jug. The background color of the pottery is a red/rust and there are whirling logs encircled in circles on the pottery. There is a black band above and below the central designs. The exterior of the jug has fading and missing polychrome paint - especially on the inside of the rim. The interior of the pottery appears clean and undamaged. The water jug is of the Maricopa Native American tribe who live in the Salt River Pima-Maricopa Indian Community, and the Gila River Indian Community along with the Pima, a tribe with whom the Maricopa have long held a positive relationship. The whirling logs on the water jug pre-date World War Two and has its origins in Navajo sand painting. The Maricopa tribe did use the whirling log symbol, but it comes from a Navajo folk tale and is considered to represent well-being and good luck. In fours, it represents directions - north, south, east and west. The whirling log symbol is used in Judaism, Islam, and Buddhism and in countries of Tibet, China, Japan and Greece, just to name a few countries. Originally the red background color was a burnished bright red/rust color.

NOTES

In the 1700s, south-central Arizona was home to the Pima and Papago and the different tribes of Yuman-speaking people to the southwest. Some of the Yuman people, the Piipash (Maricopa) moved eastward and settled among the Pima by the mid-1800s. The two tribes were united in their mutual defence. The pottery produced by the Maricopa and Pima artisans during the rest of the century is correspondingly similar. Through the 1800s ceramic containers were made for water and food storage, and for cooking. Despite strong support for Maricopa pottery, it is again in danger of disappearing as a living cultural form. The Maricopa have always used the paddle and anvil method of construction in their pottery. The interior of the water jug is pristine, the exterior of the water jug has been exposed to the elements - bright sun. The color of the bottom underside of the water jug is as new.
